Picture Perfect Procurement

Experts say that the five key attributes of a professional photographer are: creativity and imagination; an eye for detail; patience and flexibility; good people skills; and passion. By the way, these are also the attributes of a successful professional public purchasing official. So, what lessons can we learn from professional photography that apply to the work we do in public procurement? It's really about the combination of the right competencies and the right tools needed to produce brilliant results. Let's explore how the best behaviors, lenses and tripods result in a Picture-Perfect Procurement.

Performance Metrics

Many of our procurement operations engage in measuring performance regularly, while others do not. Is there value in utilizing performance data? You bet there is.... provided you understand who this data is being communicated to and how it is being utilized as part of an organization's decision-making process. In this session, we will peel back the onion with a case study from Orange County, Florida, whereby we will explore a myriad of key performance indicators as well as analysis factors that identified whether or not they were effectively demonstrating the performance of a procurement operation. Learn how modernizing our procurement performance measurements allowed us to more effectively demonstrate whether or not we are meeting our objectives. Additionally, we will explore procurement performance indicators utilized by peers around the country to identify both common and unique indicators that could contribute to organizational improvement.

2:00-2:15 Break

2:15-2:45 Barry Zimmerman, CPPB – Deputy Purchasing Manager, Multnomah County
Chair, Mentorship Program

Importance of Mentorship

The public procurement professional landscape is ever evolving. How we develop individuals and teams to support our profession in the future will look much different than it has in the past. This course is designed to encourage discussion on the value of mentorship and how to create a mentor/mentee relationship to prepare you for the challenges ahead.

Focus will be on the importance of mentorship in the procurement profession, identifying the mentorship framework, and providing resources for mentorship.
